What the Bell System Is Doing

THE picturesque figure of the military dispatch carrier, with his foam-flecked horse, has given place to the Bell Telephone System.

Eighteen new cantonment camps, each having a capacity of 30,000 men, are approaching completion. The ultimate number of these camps is set at thirty-two.

Each camp is provided with an elaborate system of telephonic communication, both local and long distance.

At every Army Post and Department Headquarters the telephone facilities have been greatly increased, so much so that in some cases it has been necessary to make complete new switchboard installations.

These new and enlarged activities call for enormous stores of telephone equipment and supplies, in order that the thousands of new stations may be properly served.

The Bell System is rapidly taking care of this extension of its service and doing so without appreciable impairment of its commercial and industrial responsibilities.
